

An Insider's Perspective on New York Marriage Patterns: The Run-On Sentence Edition

My investment banker/teacher couple theory is that you get these blonde Middlebury graduates from wealthy families and it's not really acceptable for them, in this day and age, not to work (even though they don't have to—they can totally live off of their trust funds), so they get jobs as lower school teaching assistants (their mothers went to Hewitt, they went to Spence) and they do this for a few years until they meet Mr. Right, a partner at Lehman Bros or something, and get hitched which enables them to keep their job for a few more years until they decide to have children and quit their jobs (side note: maybe at this point they got their master's in teaching and moved up to head teacher, who knows) and move with their husbands to Greenwich, CT, where the men become Metro-North commuter zombies and the women pop out the babies and eventually just become ladies who lunch. —Alexis Sverdlhoff

An Insider's Perspective on New York Marriage Patterns: The Run-On Sentence Edition

My investment banker/teacher couple theory is that you get these blonde Middlebury graduates from wealthy families and it's not really acceptable for them, in this day and age, not to work (even though they don't have to—they can totally live off of their trust funds), so they get jobs as lower school teaching assistants (their mothers went to Hewitt, they went to Spence) and they do this for a few years until they meet Mr. Right, a partner at Lehman Bros or something, and get hitched which enables them to keep their job for a few more years until they decide to have children and quit their jobs (side note: maybe at this point they got their master's in teaching and moved up to head teacher, who knows) and move with their husbands to Greenwich, CT, where the men become Metro-North commuter zombies and the women pop out the babies and eventually just become ladies who lunch. —Alexis Sverdlhoff

An Insider's Perspective on New York Marriage Patterns: The Run-On Sentence Edition

My investment banker/teacher couple theory is that you get these blonde Middlebury graduates from wealthy families and it's not really acceptable for them, in this day and age, not to work (even though they don't have to—they can totally live off of their trust funds), so they get jobs as lower school teaching assistants (their mothers went to Hewitt, they went to Spence) and they do this for a few years until they meet Mr. Right, a partner at Lehman Bros or something, and get hitched which enables them to keep their job for a few more years until they decide to have children and quit their jobs (side note: maybe at this point they got their master's in teaching and moved up to head teacher, who knows) and move with their husbands to Greenwich, CT, where the men become Metro-North commuter zombies and the women pop out the babies and eventually just become ladies who lunch. —Alexis Sverdlhoff